Consortium for Overseas Student Teaching (COST)

COST is a collaboration of 15 colleges and universities in the United States that places students in international student teaching assignments in nearly 20 countries. The program has partnerships with one or more schools in each country, allowing them to cater to most teaching areas. Sherie Williams directs the program out of Grand Valley State University. The program is not accepting new partners at this time and does not accept students outside its current partner universities, but serves as a resource and model that may be replicated by other interested groups of institutions.

Department of Defense Education Activity (DoDDEA)

DoDDEA operates a network of Department of Defense Dependent Schools (DoDDS) worldwide to provide an American-based, quality education to military families stationed overseas and civilian employees on international assignments. Candidates attending accredited institutions with agreements with DoDDS. Nearly 250 institutions in the United States participate in the program and send student teachers all over the world to complete their student teaching requirements.

Educators Abroad

Educators Abroad (EA) is an independent organization that has placed student teachers in over 60 countries worldwide since its inception. The program works closely with students and their host institutions to provide an international field experience tailored to students' needs. Craig Kissock serves as director of EA.

Global Gateway for Teachers
Formerly Cultural Immersions Projects, the Global Gateway for Teachers places student teachers in 18 countries for approximately eight weeks. The program is based out of Indiana University's School of Education, but places students from other campuses around the United States. The program also offers experiences abroad for in-service teachers. Laura Stachowski acts as director of the program.

GlobalLinks

GlobalLinks is an international education organization that has provided international student teaching opportunities for over 15 years. They partner with institutions to provide placements in seven countries around the world. The organization also provides a variety of program options to education majors and faculty interested in international experiences. Barbara West coordinates GlobalLinks’ education programs.

IFSA – Butler University

IFSA is a nonprofit organization housed at Butler University in Indianapolis that offers study abroad opportunities in all disciplines, but also currently offers teacher education programs in Northern Ireland, Australia, and Costa Rica. Students can choose a track with only coursework or specialized education tracks that includes student teaching. The program has worked with several universities around the country to provide these opportunities, and is working with several others for approval. Opal Leeman Bartzis has worked for several years to develop these programs with a group of teacher education faculty as advisors.

Interaction International

The CCTEC program with Interaction International coordinates overseas student teaching experiences for students in international schools worldwide. CCTEC only places students from their twenty-two member institutions, all of which are Christian universities and colleges.

University of Northern Iowa (UNI) Out of State and International Student Teaching Program

UNI places students from over 20 universities in international schools in dozens of countries worldwide through its international student teaching office. Leigh Martin coordinates the program from the campus of Korea International School in Seoul. UNI also offers extensive support in placing teachers in overseas schools through its Overseas Placement Service for Educators office, which includes an annual overseas recruiting fair – attended by numerous international schools from around the globe.
