“Precarious Labor in Global Perspective” — special issue of International Labor and Working-class History (ILWCH), coedited with Chris Tilly (UCLA) and Sarah Mosoetsa (University of the Witswatersrand, South Africa) [in preparation].

Stillerman, Joel. Book manuscript. Conflict Zones: Space, Time and Protest among Chile’s Metalworkers, 1945-2005 (in preparation).

This manuscript examines the trajectory of a factory-level union in Santiago, Chile during that country’s tumultuous shift from democracy to dictatorship and back again. Based on over 100 oral history interviews, 18 months of participant observation, and extensive archival research, this study examines how the state, employers, and unions shaped the neighborhood setting and class experiences of workers in South America’s largest copper manufacturing company. This setting became the crucible for a powerful metalworkers union prior to Chile’s brutal 1973 military coup. Authoritarian rule, free market policies, and globalization then reshaped that setting to undermine the union and fragment workers’ shared identities. This setting became the stage for workers’ four strikes across three political regimes in which union members engaged in contention in and over space and place.

The volume builds upon McAdam, Tarrow, and Tilly's, Dynamics of Contention to show how the use of geographical and historical analysis can enrich the key mechanisms and processes of category formation, scale shift, and opportunity/threat spirals identified in this volume. The focus on space and temporality in shaping social protest will offer new theoretical tools for students of social movements. Additionally, the manuscript makes a unique contribution to the literature on Chilean and Latin American labor as the first to study Chilean workers' shifting experiences of democratic and authoritarian regimes. Unlike many national-scale analyses of globalization and unions, it takes a bottom-up view of workers' experiences of and responses to political terror, industrial restructuring, and a changing consumer culture and shows how these changes eroded class identities. The manuscript will be appropriate for upper level undergraduate and graduate courses and of interest to specialists in social movements, urban studies, Latin American studies, labor history, and globalization.

Book-length research project, Refinement, Rivalry, and Reciprocity: Competing Logics of Middle Class Consumption in Contemporary Chile (in preparation).

This qualitative study of 70 middle class families in two Santiago communities is the first systematic effort to assess Pierre Bourdieu's model of taste and social reproduction in Chile and Latin America. By examining middle class adults' choices regarding housing purchase and decoration as well as private schooling for their children, the study seeks to determine the extent to which Chile reflects Bourdieu's prediction that parental education and income, cultural capital, and occupation determine variations in taste across distinct class fractions. I also consider the contrasting hypotheses of Lamont and Halle that variations in taste do not originate in the economic positions of distinct class fractions.

I explore this hypothesis by contrasting parents across occupational groups in a mainstream and alternative private school in each of two Santiago communities. The first area, Ñuñoa, houses an established middle class high in cultural capital; while the second area, La Florida, includes groups who have recently experienced upward mobility. Through the use of semi-structured interviews, participant observation, and household inventories with the support of photographic images, I will determine whether variations in economic and cultural capital can be clearly linked to different patterns of taste and educational decisions. Research was conducted during the 2008-2009 academic year with the support of a sabbatical and Fulbright Fellowship, and I plan to submit a book proposal and chapters for review at a university press after completion of data analysis and write-up. The results will contribute to ongoing cross-national comparative research assessing Bourdieu's claims regarding the origins of taste in the contemporary world.
