BACKGROUND

Land and Climate

Area (sq. mi.): 27,133
Area (sq. km.): 70,273

The Republic of Ireland is roughly the same size as Sierra Leone and somewhat larger than the U.S. state of West Virginia. The country covers five-sixths of the island of Ireland, which is off the northwest coast of Europe. It shares the island with Northern Ireland, which is part of the United Kingdom (UK).

Some say Ireland is like a badly baked pie—crusty around the edges and soggy in the middle. Rugged coastal hills and low mountains surround the island's fertile central plains, numerous lakes, and bogs. No part of the country is more than 70 miles (112 kilometers) from the coast. The Shannon is the longest river.

Snow falls only on a few days in winter and quickly melts because of the moderating effect of the North Atlantic Current; winters are therefore wet and mild. The coldest temperatures average 30 to 40°F (-1 to 4°C). Summers are cool. The warmest month is July, which has an average temperature below 65°F (18°C). Ireland's dampness, fog, and rain make the country lush and green.

History

Conversion to Christianity and English Rule

There have been people living in Ireland for several thousand years. In the fourth century BC, the Celts arrived and dominated the island for a thousand years. Legend has it that St. Patrick came to Ireland in AD 432, bringing Christianity and converting the people. Vikings invaded in 795 and established seaports in Ireland.

The Celts eventually defeated the Vikings in 1014. But in the 12th century, the king of Leinster, Dermot MacMurrough, who had lost his kingdom after a dispute with the high king, invited the English to battle his opponents. In 1171, King Henry II of England forced Irish nobles to recognize his supreme rule. Over time, though, the English invaders adopted local culture and the Irish regained some autonomy.

In the early 1600s, England defeated the last major Gaelic leaders and established rule over all of Ireland. Irish Anglicans, supported by England, excluded Catholics from controlling land and politics. In 1801, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland was established with the Act of Union, a change that was not popular among Irish Catholics.

The Great Potato Famine and Independence

The country was devastated in the 1840s by the great potato famine; at least one million people died within five years, and another two million emigrated to other countries, notably the United States. Political conflict intensified after the famine, bringing rebellions and agitation for independence. The movement climaxed in 1921 with the signing of the Anglo-Irish Treaty. This treaty established the Irish Free State as a British dominion and allowed six northern counties (with a Protestant majority) to remain in the UK as Northern Ireland.

Under a new constitution in 1937, The Irish Free State changed its name to Ireland (or Éire in Gaelic). The country began to decrease its association with the British Commonwealth. In 1949, Ireland formally withdrew from the Commonwealth and declared itself completely independent. Northern Ireland remained part of the UK.

A Separate Ireland

Many Irish want Northern Ireland and Ireland to be reunited, but talks over the years have not been fruitful. The issue has been complicated by vocal minorities who have used violence to support or oppose unification. Militant forces include the Irish Republican Army (IRA), which favors unification, and loyalist, or unionist, Protestant paramilitary groups, which oppose it. Very few people advocate violence as a means of pursuing political objectives.

Peace talks in the 1990s repeatedly failed. When the IRA finally called a cease-fire in 1994, the gesture was soon returned by several loyalist militias. Encouraged by this, Great Britain, Ireland, and some Northern Ireland leaders pressed forward with a peace plan. However, talks stalled, and in February 1996 the IRA broke its 17-month cease-fire.

That same year, former U.S. senator George Mitchell led efforts to revive the talks. In April 1998, eight political parties and the British and Irish governments reached an agreement on a historic peace accord. The so-called Good Friday Agreement called for the creation of a local government for Northern Ireland and some joint policymaking between Dublin and Belfast. All parties agreed to respect the wishes of Northern Ireland's people. In 2005, the IRA issued a landmark statement announcing the end to its armed campaign. Early in 2007, the IRA's political wing and the main unionist party entered into a government together.

Economic Growth and Crisis

One important trend in Ireland's recent history has been its rapid economic growth. The economy began expanding quickly in the 1990s. This strong growth continued until the 2008 global financial crisis. The Irish economy was one of the worst hit by the resulting recession. Although the economy officially came out of recession in 2010, the country must still battle high levels of unemployment and focus on economic recovery. In June 2012, Irish voters approved a European Union (EU) fiscal pact designed to bring stability to national governments in the midst of the eurozone crisis. Ireland was granted a seven-year extension in April 2013 to pay back the bailout loans given to the country by the EU and International Monetary Fund (IMF) in 2010. This extension was granted a week after the IMF released a negative assessment of Ireland’s economy, warning the country that it must do more to deal with its domestic banking problems.

Recent Events and Trends

- Abortion: In October 2013, a pregnant woman died in a hospital following a miscarriage. The hospital had denied the woman an abortion when she began miscarrying because Irish law prohibits performing an abortion if the fetus still has a heartbeat. The incident sparked nationwide protests, as well as several international protests, against Ireland’s restrictive and confusing abortion laws. In July 2013, a new law was passed that legalized abortion when necessary to save a mother's life.

- Emigration: Between 2008 and 2013, over 300,000 Irish people emigrated, moving out of the country. Nearly a quarter of all households have a family member who has emigrated, and in mid-2013 the National Youth Council of Ireland called for the government to develop a strategy and a dedicated ministry to help prepare potential emigrants.

- Irish president visits United Kingdom: In April 2014, Irish president Michael Higgins visited the United Kingdom and met with many political leaders, including the prime minister. It was the first state visit an Irish head of state has ever made to the United Kingdom. Many see the visit as evidence of warming relations between the two countries.

THE PEOPLE

Population

Population: 4,832,765
Population Growth Rate: 1.2%
Urban Population: 63%

Ireland's population is growing, due primarily to an increase in immigration. For much of Ireland's past, emigration was the norm for people seeking employment. Although some Irish still emigrate to Britain, the United States, or Australia, emigration is far less common than it once was.

More than one in three people live in the metropolitan Dublin area. Overall, the majority of the population lives in urban areas. Ethnically, the people of Ireland are Celtic. There is also a strong Norman influence and a small English (Anglo-Irish) minority. There is an increasing non-European minority.

Travellers (semi-nomadic groups with shared history, traditions, and culture, sometimes referred to pejoratively as modern-day gypsies) are estimated to make up 0.5 percent of the population, though many believe their actual numbers to be higher. Travellers generally live in mobile camps, separated from the rest of society. Life expectancy, education attendance, and income levels of Travellers lag far behind those of the rest of the population.

Language

The Irish Gaelic language (also known as Irish) is the officially recognized first language. It is a part of the Celtic family of languages and is related to Scottish Gaelic, Welsh, and Breton. Use of Irish Gaelic is limited but increasingly popular. It is spoken on a daily basis in Irish-speaking communities called Gaeltacht and especially in parts of the counties of Kerry, Galway, and Donegal.

English, recognized as Ireland's second language, is spoken by everyone and is the language of instruction in schools; Irish, however, is a required course, and the government has sponsored initiatives to increase fluency. Government documents and road signs are written in both languages. Ireland has a television station that broadcasts all its programs in Irish. Travellers speak their own language (called Shelte or Gammon) in addition to English.

Religion

About 85 percent of the population is Roman Catholic, and a relatively large number of residents actively practice the religion. Nearly 3 percent belongs to the Anglican Church of Ireland. The remaining 12 percent holds various other beliefs—both Christian and non-Christian—or has no religious affiliation.

Although there is no state church and freedom of religion is guaranteed, the Catholic Church has played an important role in Ireland's cultural and political history, and it continues to shape the values of the people and laws of the land. For instance, the ban on divorce, which ended in 1995, and the current ban on abortion (except when the life of the mother is threatened) came about largely because of the Catholic Church's efforts. However, attendance at religious services has been dropping, and the influence of the Catholic Church is not as strong as it has been in the past.

General Attitudes
The Irish are easygoing, lighthearted, good-humored, polite, and cheerful. They are quick-witted and have the ability to laugh at themselves. A general attitude that things will work out in the end affects their daily lives. The pace of life is somewhat influenced by the old maxim “When God made time, he made plenty of it.” The Irish word craic (CRAK) means “fun” or “good atmosphere” and expresses an idea that is highly valued by the Irish. Traditions are important, but some groups are calling for social and political liberalization, including greater tolerance for nontraditional lifestyles.

Traditional Irish values include having a good education and a secure job, owning a home, and possessing a good sense of humor. The booming economy has increased tension between the traditional relaxed attitude of the Irish and the capitalistic urge to earn more. However, material goods still do not top the list of Irish priorities.

Individualism is admired, but aggressiveness, arrogance, and fanaticism are not. The Irish avoid personal confrontation; they rarely say “no” to a person's face but communicate it in a different way. Most Irish resent outside criticism of their society or politics. The Irish consider it important to be politically neutral. For example, Ireland did not participate in World War II.

Some people wonder what differences exist between residents of Ireland and those in Northern Ireland. Because both nations share a common cultural heritage, much is similar. The differences have their roots in centuries-old conflicts over exploitation, politics, and religion.

Personal Appearance
European fashions are most common, although people also incorporate Irish styles. For example, traditional earth tones and warm colors are popular in Ireland. Sweaters and other woolen items are common because of the cooler climate. Fine-quality tweeds and linens are produced in Ireland. Casual dress is acceptable in most situations, but attire worn in public is generally conservative and shorts are uncommon. Light rainwear is necessary for anyone living or traveling in Ireland.

CUSTOMS AND COURTESIES

Greetings

The Irish may shake hands when being introduced or when greeting a friend or associate. English phrases such as Hello and How are you? are used throughout the country. Depending on the situation, the Irish may say Good morning, Good evening, Hello, and so on. A typical Irish-language greeting is Dia Dhuit (God to you), to which the response is Dia is Maire duir (God and Mary to you). Slan (meaning “safe”) is used for good-bye. The more formal farewell is Slan agus Beannacht (Safe and blessed).

When addressing friends, relatives, and acquaintances, the Irish generally use first names. However, titles (Mr., Mrs., Ms., Miss, Dr.) and last names are used formally or with people of higher status. Close friends may kiss on the cheek when meeting. Women kiss both male and female friends, while men kiss only female friends. Rural Irish greet each other when passing on the street, even if not acquainted, but urban residents reserve such greetings for neighbors and people they know.

Gestures
The Irish do not use hand gestures excessively during conversation, but neither do they keep hands entirely still—some gesticulation is common.

The Irish value politeness and generally do not push each other (even if in a hurry), cut in lines, eat on the street (or on the run), comb hair in public, or otherwise offend those around them. If one breaches social norms, apologies are usually in order.

People generally hold the door for someone coming in behind them. It is also common for people to give up a seat on a bus or train so that a pregnant woman or elderly person may sit down. It is considered polite to thank a bus driver when exiting the bus. Drivers on quiet country roads usually acknowledge one another with a small wave.

Some common Irish gestures stem from the country's strong Roman Catholic tradition. Many homes keep a holy water font beside the front door, and it is customary for people to dip their fingers in it and then bless themselves as they leave the house. Older people often make the sign of the cross when passing a church or a cemetery, or when an ambulance passes with its sirens on.

Visiting
The Irish are warm and hospitable. They often spend time together in pubs (public houses) or invite others to their home for dinner. Pubs serve more than just alcohol; they are prized for their food and atmosphere. People are allowed to go to pubs before they reach the legal drinking age, and Irish of all ages like to get out and gather for conversation there. Some say conversation is the national pastime. Many pubs feature folk music as entertainment. People generally take turns paying for a round of drinks for their group. Not paying for drinks when it is “your round” is considered extremely rude.

Visiting in the home is much more common during holidays, especially between Christmas and New Year's Day. Parties are also popular during other holidays. Calling by (visiting) is a common custom. It stems from the tradition of gathering groups of people together by going from house to house. In rural areas, stays are usually longer and more informal. Guests are always offered tea or coffee. If it is teatime (dinnertime), visitors are invited to stay for dinner. It is polite to take a gift to someone if overnight accommodations are provided.

Eating
The Irish eat three meals a day, with the main meal in the evening. When possible, families sit down together for meals. Supper, the final meal of the day, often is served later in the evening.

Sunday dinners with extended family are a common tradition. The Irish eat in the continental style, with the fork in the left hand and the knife in the right. Table manners are important, and guests are expected to take care not to make a mess eating. Loud eating noises, such as slurping and lip smacking, are not acceptable at the table.

Traditional Irish dishes are simple and hearty. In addition to Irish cuisine, European dishes are popular. Many types of restaurants, including U.S. fast food, are found in Ireland. Traditional foods are often served in pubs. Tipping is not customary, but is becoming more common in high-end restaurants.

LIFESTYLE

Family

Structure
Family cohesiveness is very important in Ireland. When work or study takes a family member to distant parts of Ireland or to other countries, he or she makes a great effort to return home as often as possible—especially for Christmas. Extended families often live near one another.

The average family has two children. The number of single-parent families has increased in recent years. Stigmas associated with divorce and having children out of wedlock are nearly nonexistent in today's Ireland. Many attribute this to the Catholic Church's waning influence on society.

Parents and Children
Children generally live with their parents until they leave to attend university, move in with a partner, or become financially independent enough to pay for their own apartment. In rural areas, children often leave home at 18 or 19 to attend universities or look for jobs in bigger cities. In urban areas, particularly Dublin, young people commonly live at home longer, as housing prices are prohibitively high for many to move out. Adult children living with their parents are generally expected to contribute financially to the household, though in many cases the amount is quite small.

Adult children care for their aging parents, either by caring for them themselves or arranging care in a nursing home. While in previous generations, the norm was for elderly parents to move in with their grown children when they could no longer live independently, today nursing homes are an increasingly common option.

Gender Roles
Due to the high cost of living, both parents work in order to make ends meet. However, Irish women stay at home to care for the children and household more often than do women in some other European countries. Many younger women are becoming career oriented, and more than half of all women are in the workforce. Competitive salaries and support services for women lag behind those for men. Ireland's president has spent a good deal of time promoting an agenda of greater women's equality.

Housing

Modern
Since the second half of the twentieth century, bungalows (one-storey structures that can be built relatively cheaply and easily) have been replacing more traditional and (in many people's eyes) more aesthetically pleasing houses. While the Irish sometimes lament this trend, they realize that bungalows provide an opportunity for people to buy their own homes. In many ways, bungalows are a symbol of contemporary middle-class Irish living, and their ubiquity is a sign of Ireland's emergence as a modern nation. Still, aspirations to expand the base of home ownership and showcase modern Ireland are balanced against the desire to retain historic Ireland's beauty and preserve its archaeological heritage.

A recent trend is housing estates (residential developments where homes are planned and built at the same time). Usually built in suburban areas, these estates provide a more affordable option to city living, although residents often make long commutes to work in the cities. With the economic downturn, Ireland's housing and construction market, once seen as the flagship of Ireland's economic progress, were severely damaged. Many newly built housing estates remain unoccupied or unfinished. For many, these “ghost estates” have become a symbol of Ireland's recent economic troubles.

Traditional
In the Irish countryside, homes are not always clustered in villages. Instead, they are often spread relatively far apart along roads and through fields, giving the landscape a somewhat haphazard look. Traditional thatched-roof cottages can still be seen in some rural areas, but such dwellings are no longer built today. Many families also have resort homes for vacations.

Ownership
Although many young families rent an apartment (flat) or house, most eventually own a home. Home ownership is highly valued, partly because of the country's history of having harsh landlords. Many young families buy homes in "commuter towns" and drive into the cities for work.

Arguments go back and forth as to whether it is now too easy or too difficult to obtain planning permission for building new homes. The rapid growth of cities like Dublin and Galway has led to the sudden development of large suburban areas, where crime is sometimes a problem.

Dating and Marriage

Dating and Courtship
Going to pubs is a popular social activity for people of all ages. Teenagers enjoy going to movies and dancing. The tradition of taking a special date to the graduation ball (similar to the prom in the United States) has developed in the last decade. Debs (graduation balls) call for formal suits and dresses, a large meal, and a dance at a local hotel.
Couples tend to live together before marrying. The average marriage age has steadily increased in recent years. Today, most people marry in their early thirties. Men generally propose marriage, though occasionally women propose.

Weddings

More than 70 percent of couples choose a Catholic wedding. The remainder chooses a civil wedding. Ceremonies held in a church consist of two parts: a religious ceremony and the civil component of signing the civil register.

Catholic weddings and some civil weddings are performed in a church and are automatically accepted as legal. Civil weddings may be performed in a registry office. In 2007, it became legal for couples to be married civilly by a registrar in a venue other than the registry office. Since then, many people choose venues other than churches and the registry office. Catholic weddings are generally performed as part of a mass.

After the wedding ceremony, most couples hold a reception. Receptions are usually held in a hotel ballroom and include a formal meal followed by speeches from members of the wedding party (usually, the groom, the best man, and the couple's fathers). The evening usually finishes up with music and dancing.

Divorce

Ireland's constitution prohibited divorce until 1997, when a law passed after the Irish people voted by a margin of 1 percent to legalize it. The current law permits Irish couples to divorce after four years of separation. Ireland has the second lowest divorce rate in the European Union.

Life Cycle

Birth

Most Irish people—even those who rarely go to church—observe traditional Catholic life cycle rituals. Important events include baptism and confirmation, the celebration of which brings families and friends together.

Some consider it bad luck to buy a gift for an unborn child. Traditionally, babies were named after their grandparents. This tradition is less common now, though baby boys are still commonly given family names.

Christenings, usually held when the child is about three months old, are important events. After the ceremony, the family often holds a celebration at a restaurant, in a pub, or at their home.

Milestones

An important Catholic milestone is receiving the first communion at age eight. Girls wear white dresses, and boys wear formal suits for the occasion. After the ceremony, the child usually visits the homes of relatives and neighbors, who admire the new outfit and give the child a gift (almost always money). This is usually followed by a meal at home or in a local hotel. These rituals are repeated at the child's confirmation five years later, though girls do not wear white to this ceremony.

Other milestones center around education. Important events include the first day of primary school, the first day of secondary school, and leaving home to begin college.

Death

Funerals are occasions for big gatherings. Ceremonies are nearly always religious. In the past, the body was laid out in the family home, and mourning women carried out the keening (crying). In rural areas, the body may still be kept at the home, with friends, relatives, and neighbors coming to pay their respects. Tea, sandwiches, and biscuits (cookies) are usually served. Someone generally sits up all night with the body; this could be family members, friends, or neighbors.

In urban areas, the body is generally kept at a funeral home, where mourners gather for a somber wake to pay their respects. Friends and neighbors usually help arrange the wake and take care of details that arise. A funeral service is held the day after the wake, followed by the burial.

While cremation is an option in Ireland, the vast majority chooses to be buried. The deceased is generally buried three days after death. After the burial, mourners gather for a more lively time at the family home or a pub, where a drinks and a light meal—perhaps soup and sandwiches—are served and guests reminisce about the deceased.

Diet

As an agricultural country, Ireland produces many fresh vegetables. Fresh dairy products, breads, and seafood are also widely available. Potatoes are a staple food for the Irish. Since Ireland joined the European Union (EU), a wide variety of fruits have become available.

Smoked salmon is considered an Irish specialty, as are Irish stew and Irish lamb. Other local delicacies include crubeens (pig feet) and colcannon (a cooked mixture of potatoes and cabbage). Tea is the most common drink. Breakfasts usually are large and include such foods as bacon and eggs. The main meats eaten for dinner include chicken, pork, beef, and lamb.

Recreation

Sports

The Irish are sports oriented and most weekends include some sporting activities for the family or individual. Soccer and rugby are popular, and many people follow UK professional teams.

Other popular sports include two national pastimes: hurling and Gaelic football. Hurling is played on a soccer-type field with wooden sticks and a small leather ball. The women's version of hurling is called camogie. Gaelic football is played with a round ball and is somewhat of a cross between soccer and basketball. Players can touch the ball with their hands, but they cannot pick it up from the ground. The ball is punched, not thrown, and it can be kicked. Teams score by getting the ball into a net as in soccer, but they can also make points for putting it over the top of the goal.

The Irish enjoy both playing and watching hurling and Gaelic football. Although no professional teams play either sport, amateur Gaelic football teams play throughout the country and meet each September for the All Ireland Finals.

Leisure

The Irish enjoy reading, and book clubs have become popular in recent years. People enjoy keeping up with current events, which are a popular topic of conversation. People also enjoy socializing and drinking in pubs.
Sailing, cycling, golf, hunting, shooting, and horse racing are also favorite activities. Fishing is another common recreational activity, with trout and salmon fishing being the most common. Walking and hiking are popular as well, with hillwalking clubs active throughout the country. Many families make it a Sunday tradition to go for walks in the countryside.

Vacation

Most families take a vacation each year, the length and destination of which depend on the family's economic means. Low-cost airlines have made foreign destinations (especially those within Europe) more accessible to the average person. People also enjoy vacationing within Ireland, particularly along the coasts.

The Arts

Literature is a major part of Irish culture, and the country has produced many distinguished writers, such as Samuel Beckett, Seamus Heaney, George Bernard Shaw, and William Butler Yeats. Irish literature is written in Gaelic and English. Much traditional folklore is in Irish Gaelic and records genealogy or tells stories of patron saints, ghosts, and fairies. Ireland's artists and writers have been inspired by the country's mythology and history.

Ireland's musical tradition is thousands of years old. When the native language was suppressed, history was transmitted by songs with historical and patriotic themes. Traditional Irish music, often blended with contemporary forms, is popular around the world. Common instruments include flutes, bagpipes, fiddles, button accordions, concertinas, harps, bodhráns (Celtic drums), and penny whistles. Successful modern musicians include U2, Sinead O'Connor, the Cranberries, and the Frames. Many Irish enjoy participating in events or clubs that focus on the arts. They also enjoy handicrafts such as knitting and embroidery.

Holidays

The main public holidays in Ireland are New Year's Day, St. Patrick's Day (17 Mar.), Easter (Friday–Monday), Labour Day (1 May), the bank holidays (the first Monday in both June and August, and the last Monday in October), Christmas, and St. Stephen's Day (26 Dec.).

Christian Holidays

On St. Patrick's Day, the Irish honor their patron saint by throwing street parades (the largest is in Dublin). However, some people in the United States celebrate the day more fervently than people in Ireland.

Easter is celebrated with a traditional meal and candy eggs. On this day, it is said that the sun dances for joy as it is rising. Traditionally, children were encouraged to get up early to watch the sunrise. A bucket of water was provided so that children could see the sunrise in the reflection on the water instead of looking directly at the sun—and so that parents could lightly disturb the water to make the sun “dance.” While most people are familiar with this tradition, it is no longer widely practiced.

St. Stephen's Day commemorates the death of the first Christian martyr. Celebrations in Ireland center around a legend that tells of a wren that pointed out St. Stephen's hiding place to his enemies. Men and boys, called wrenboys, celebrate St. Stephen's Day by carrying around an effigy of a wren and going from house to house singing songs. Wrenboys dress in traditional costumes made from straw or in colorful assortments of old clothes. In the northern part of Ireland, they are called mummers and go around in the weeks leading up to Christmas rather than on St. Stephen's Day.

Christmas is the main family and social celebration. Families return home to share a traditional meal of turkey and ham. It is also a popular time for the wealthy to take a “sun” holiday in a warmer climate.

Seasonal Celebrations

The ancient Celts celebrated the beginning of each of the year's seasons. While these celebrations began as pagan holidays, they have since been largely Christianized. However, they still maintain many pagan elements. The seasonal celebrations are based on the Celtic calendar and, therefore, do not align with the traditional summer and winter solstices.

The beginning of spring (1 Feb.) is marked by St. Brigid's Day, which is less celebrated today than in the past. On this day, people make Christian crosses out of rushes and straw and eat traditional foods such as bruítín (a mixture of mashed potatoes, onions, and milk). The beginning of summer (1 May) is celebrated with the Feast of Bealtaine. The tradition of lighting bonfires on this day survives only in the city of Limerick. In some rural areas, Lughnasa celebrations mark the beginning of fall (1 Aug.) with bonfires and dancing.

The beginning of winter (1 Nov.) is marked by Halloween, which is based on the Celtic holiday Samhain. On Samhain, the Celts believed that the dead were free to walk among the living. Many of today's Halloween traditions—such as costumes, practical jokes, and creatures like witches, ghosts, and goblins—have their origins in ancient Samhain traditions. Children dress up and go house to house asking for candy, while adults often attend parties. Barm brack (a fruit cake) is often served. The cake usually has a ring hidden inside it, and whoever finds the ring is said to be getting married within the year.

Society

Government

Head of State: Pres. Michael D. Higgins
Head of Government: PM Enda Kenny
Capital: Dublin

Structure

The Republic of Ireland is headed by a popularly elected president, who serves a seven-year term. The president has few executive powers but can exercise considerable influence on national politics. The head of government is called the Taoiseach (TEE-shuch), and is essentially a prime minister. The Taoiseach is nominated by the House of Representatives and appointed by the president. The cabinet is drawn from members of the legislature.

The bicameral legislature includes the 166-seat House of Representatives (Dáil) and the 60-seat Senate (Seanad).
Members of the House are elected through proportional representation at least every five years. Eleven members of the Senate are appointed by the prime minister. The remaining 49 are elected by universities and vocational panels. Members of the Senate serve five-year terms.

Ireland's highest court is the Supreme Court, which helps decide matters of constitutionality. Judges are appointed by the president. For local government purposes, Ireland is divided into 28 counties; 3 cities are on the same administrative level as Ireland's counties. Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom and so is not considered part of Ireland.

Political Landscape

Traditionally, Ireland's two biggest parties do not offer separate ideologies, but rather evolved from different sides of the Irish Civil War, which was between those who supported the Anglo-Irish Treaty and those who opposed it. The two parties, Fianna Fáil (which opposed the treaty) and Fine Gael (which supported the treaty), are both center-right parties and have been the defining parties of Irish politics since independence.

Fianna Fáil has generally enjoyed greater support and power than Fine Gael, though elections in 2011 saw a major shift of popular support to Fine Gael, which formed a coalition government with the Labour Party. A few other political parties hold seats in the legislature as well. Political parties are required to have at least 40 percent of their candidates be women and at least 40 percent be men, or they lose public funding.

Major issues of concern to Ireland's government include Ireland's relationship with the European Union (EU), the status of Northern Ireland, and overcoming economic difficulties caused by the eurozone crisis.

Government and the People

The government respects many freedoms, including the freedom of speech, assembly, religion, and the press. All citizens may vote at age 18. Voter turnout regularly reaches or exceeds 65 percent for parliamentary elections, though a significantly lower percent of voters participate in electing the president.

Economy

*GDP (PPP) in billions: $190.4
GDP (PPP) per capita: $41,300*

Ireland has a small, open economy that was growing rapidly until the global financial crisis of 2008 hit, sending the country into recession. Prior to the recession, Ireland was able to drastically reduce inflation, encourage more exports, and attract foreign investment, especially from high-tech companies. Because of this economic boom, Ireland is sometimes referred to as the Celtic Tiger. In 2010, Ireland accepted a bailout loan of $112 billion from the European Union (EU) and International Monetary Fund (IMF), and the current government has used austerity measures to lower what was once one of the world's largest budget deficits.

While agriculture was once the main sector of the economy, only 5 percent of the labor force is employed in it today. Instead, a diversified economy now relies more heavily on the services and technology sectors, as well as industries such as textiles, chemicals, and machinery. In agriculture, ranching and dairy farming are important. Key crops include potatoes, sugar beets, turnips, barley, and wheat. The country is generally self-sufficient in foodstuffs, although fruits and some other items must be imported.

Tourism is a large and growing sector of the economy. Ireland relies heavily on trade, especially with nations of the European Union (EU). In 2002, the euro replaced Ireland's old currency, the punt.

Transportation and Communications

*Internet Users (per 100 people): 78
Cellular Phone Subscriptions (per 100 people): 103
Paved Roads: 100%*

Buses are the most common form of public transportation. Government-run and private bus companies provide an efficient way to travel between and within cities. Taxis are not regulated by the government. Most people use them to come home after a night out; if they are shared among two or more passengers, the prices are reasonable. Irish rail systems provide links to major cities, and Dublin has an efficient tram system called the Luas (the Irish word for “speed”). Roads generally are paved and in good condition; however, there are too few highways to accommodate shipping and commuters. The government has pledged to improve the infrastructure for business and for regular travel throughout the country. Most families have at least one car. Vehicles travel on the left side of the road.

Although the communications system is small, it is modern and efficient. There are several radio and television stations in Ireland. A variety of daily newspapers are published throughout the country. Freedom of the press is generally respected, though defamation laws hold journalists guilty until proven innocent. Nearly everyone has a cellular phone (called a mobile), and high-speed internet connections are found throughout the country.

Education

*Adult Literacy: 99%
Mean Years of Schooling: 11.6*

Structure and Access

The Irish constitution specifies that parents have the freedom to provide for the education of their children, whether it be in public schools (the most common), in private schools, or in their own homes. Schooling is compulsory for students between ages 5 and 15.

Students attend primary school from ages 5 through 12. Secondary school is divided into two cycles: the junior cycle (ages 12 through 15) and the senior cycle (ages 15 through 18). Nearly 90 percent of students complete secondary school. Students may also choose to attend vocational or technical colleges.

The government provides free education in primary and secondary schools and gives substantial aid to post-secondary institutions. Students pay for textbooks and uniforms. Low-income families receive a government subsidy to help with these expenses.

School Life
Most schools are funded by the state and run by the Roman Catholic Church. Though the teaching staff are generally not affiliated with the church, many schools still maintain a Roman Catholic philosophy, with religious artwork on the walls and students studying religion as part of their education. A growing number of schools offer non-religious education, though this is more common at the secondary level than the primary level.

Almost all Irish schools have a uniform, and students address teachers as Sir or Miss. Local boards composed of parent representatives, teaching staff, and relevant religious authorities manage primary schools. In secondary school, students take classes in seven or eight different subjects. English, Irish, and math are required. Students choose the remaining four or five subjects based on their interests and what their school offers.

Irish students take two sets of state exams in secondary school. The Junior Certificate is taken at the end of the junior cycle, at age 15. The results determine which subjects the student should study and at which level. The Leaving Certificate is taken at the end of the senior cycle, at age 18. These results determine students’ entry into universities and institutes of technology.

Health
Ireland's population is generally healthy. Well-equipped public medical clinics are located throughout the country. Care in public hospitals is provided at government cost. Many people choose to go to private doctors and facilities to avoid the waiting lists and other inconveniences of the public system. Long-term medical services are free to persons with infectious diseases and to children suffering from certain conditions.
